Many trails in the Sandia Mountains are managed for multiple use. Please practice trail courtesy.

The perennial and intermittent springs and streams on the mountain are not a reliable source of water. Don't be caught off guard or unprepared! Carry plenty of food and water, dress in layers, wear walking shoes or boots, carry rain gear, let someone know where you are going and when you will return. Be aware that storms can move into the mountains quickly.

Danger Tree Alert

Be aware of dead standing trees or "snags" while on your hike, and watch for falling trees. Falling trees can cause serious injury or death. This danger increases in windy conditions. The drought weakened trees here are very susceptible to insects and disease, and thousands of trees have died in recent years. Danger trees are routinely removed from developed sites (such as picnic areas and trailheads) but may still be present in other areas of the Forest.
