

FORT GADSDEN HISTORIC SITE

Imagine a historic fort overlooking the peaceful Apalachicola River. This mental image is probably one of quiet territorial life, but the actual history surrounding Fort Gadsden is one of bloody battles for power during Spanish Florida's last days. Called the "Hill of Good Vistas" by the Spanish and "Achackweithle" by Native Americans, the prominent bank on the majestic Apalachicola River hosted international conflict that determined the destiny of nations.

Escaped slaves had long found refuge in Spanish Florida since before the Revolutionary War. But in the early 1800s, Spain was losing its hold on Florida. Seeing an opportunity to advance its own interests on the continent, Britain took advantage of Spain's weak defenses. Unchallenged, British Col. Edward Nicolls and Captain George Woodbine established a stronghold called "British Fort" on the Apalachicola River and, by offering land and freedom in the British West Indies for service, recruited more slaves from Louisiana, Mobile, Pensacola, Georgia and the Lower Creek Nation.

Nicolls constructed the fort in 1814 at a small company storehouse and settlement called "Prospect Bluff," and in the early summer of 1815, he sailed for England with prominent members of the Nation in order to negotiate an agreement with the Creek Nation. Ample artillery and military supplies were left behind and a black military leader named Garcon took command. Before leaving, the British had trained and armed about 3,000 Indian and 300 black soldiers to protect the fort, which safeguarded families, fields and pastures extending 50 miles along the Apalachicola River. Sometimes known as the "Negro Fort," the post earned a reputation as a threat to supply vessels that traveled the Apalachicola River between the United States and the Gulf of Mexico. In response, the United States ordered that the fort be destroyed.

Alerted to the impending attack, black families and Choctaw, Upper Creek and Seminole women and children took refuge in the fort. Others hid in the surrounding forests. On July 17, 1816, Col. Duncan Clinch left Fort Scott at the junction of the Flint and Chattahoochee Rivers in Georgia and traveled down the Apalachicola River with 116 men. Clinch and his men combined forces with Maj. William McIntosh and his company of 150 Lower Creek Indians.

They surrounded the British Fort that flew the Union Jack flag. Though they had been met with threats that any American vessel attempting to pass would be sunk, Clinch ordered his men to move up. Around 5 a.m. on July 27, their advance was accompanied by shots from gunboats.

Early in the battle, a heated shot, glowing red, landed in the magazine of the fort, literally blowing it to pieces. Clinch later reported that, "the explosion was awful and the scene horrible beyond description." Of the 300 people, about 200 women and children and 100 men, who took refuge in the fort at the time of the attack, only 33 survived the blast. The defending leaders, Garson and a chief of the Choctaw Nation, were two of the survivors. When the Americans learned that Edward Daniels, who had earlier been taken captive, had been tarred and burned alive, Garson and the Choctaw chief were turned over to McIntosh's Creeks, who sentenced them to death. Survivors that were once slaves were eventually returned to their owners.

American soldiers burned what was left of the fort and all of the surrounding settlements. The fort had been well stocked with weapons, much better than the Americans had suspected. To encourage support, the Americans had promised McIntosh's Lower Creeks could have whatever weapons were taken after destroying the fort, and it proved to be a surprisingly fortunate acquisition.

The pace of destruction and bloodshed increased over the next 2 years for everyone along the Apalachicola River on the American border. Settlers were killed, plantations raided, livestock and slaves seized. Ft. Scott was evacuated in the fall of 1816 after the destruction of British Fort, leaving custody of the buildings to a Creek ally named Perryman.

In April 1818, Andrew Jackson led a force down the Apalachicola River to destroy Seminole and allied Upper Creek villages in what is called the First Seminole War. Impressed by the strategic location of the old fort, Jackson instructed Lt. James Gadsden to build a new fortification upon the site as a supply base. Inspired by the lieutenant's zeal, Jackson named the fort in Gadsden's honor.

Jackson seized St. Marks in April 1818. Later the same month, under Jackson's direction, a court-martial sentenced a Scottish trader and a former British Lieutenant to death, for supplying blacks, Seminoles and their allies with weapons and powder. Jackson's extreme measures in Spanish Florida exceeded orders from the War Department and almost led to war with Spain and England.

Jackson's actions decisively ended Spanish and British interests in Florida. Survivors of British Fort fought later in the Seminole Wars on both sides. Some black descendants left for Texas and played major roles in the Mexican American War, some adapted to a life within Native American societies. Seminoles eventually joined their kin and allies in southern Florida or settled in Oklahoma during Indian Removal of the early 1830s. The Choctaw and Upper Creek survivors either joined the Seminole or dispersed with family elsewhere, some also settling in Oklahoma.

Gadsden, later known for the famed Gadsden Purchase of 1853, maintained the fort until Spain ceded Florida to the United States in 1821. The fort was virtually forgotten until 1862, when the Confederate Army realized that Apalachicola was the largest exporting and importing route in the region, and that the river led to plantations in Florida, Georgia and Alabama. Confederate troops actually occupied the fort until July of 1863, when malaria forced them to move from the lowlands along the river.

PROTECT FORT GADSDEN AND HERITAGE RESOURCES

Fort Gadsden Historic Site is a National Historic Landmark and is listed in the National Register of Historic Places. This means that the site has been recognized as an important piece of our national heritage and warrants special protection.

The Archeological Resources Protection Act of 1979 (and its amendments) protects this site and all others of historic and prehistoric (before Columbus) significance in the national forests. This law provides severe penalties for collecting artifacts from public land. This area is closed to possession and use of metal detectors.

Apalachicola River Steamboat Hauling Cotton

For more information about Fort Gadsden or the Apalachicola National Forest, please contact the

Apalachicola National Forest

P. O. Box 579, Route 20

Bristol, Florida 32321

Phone: (850) 643-2282

TDD Relay 1-800-955-8770

The U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA) prohibits discrimination in all its programs and activities on the basis of race, color, national origin, sex, religion, age, disability, political beliefs, sexual orientation, or marital or family status. (Not all prohibited bases apply to all programs.) Persons with disabilities who require alternative means for communication of program information (Braille, large print, audiotape, etc.) should contact USDA's TARGET Center at (202) 720-2600 (voice and TDD).

To file a complaint of discrimination, write USDA, Director, Office of Civil Rights, Room 326-W, Whitten Building, 1400 Independence Avenue, SW, Washington, D.C. 20250-9410 or call (202) 720-5964 (voice and TDD). USDA is an equal opportunity provider and employer.

FORT GADSDEN

Historical Site

Seminole Brave

Apalachicola National Forest

Forest Service

Southern Region

United States Department of Agriculture

