

UNITED STATES FOREST SERVICE

INTERNATIONAL SEMINARS

The U.S. Forest Service International Seminars Program builds global learning communities of practitioners engaged in natural resource management issues. In two to three week courses based in strategic locations around the United States, participants meet with community members, government representatives, academic researchers, and the private sector to understand and exchange innovative approaches to shared conservation challenges. Field visits and panel discussions bring out key themes such as engaging communities, strengthening partnerships among diverse stakeholders, empowering women, and building resilience. All seminars conclude with robust application planning in which participants develop action plans for incorporating their new skills and competencies into their work at home.
